

Gaige E. Mora

May 20, 1999 - October 16, 2018

Gaige was born in Yakima Washington, to Danna Marie Henderson and David Valentino Mora, the youngest of their three children. Gaige is preceded by his two older sisters, Justine Camille and Ivy Lynn and his younger half brother Alexander Eathan. His parents separated when Gaige was very young, and both remarried, his mother to Jessie Laya, his father to Danita Kimball. Gaige attended many schools in Yakima and even more yet when he and his family moved to East Wenatchee. Gaige had settled into East Wenatchee and loved the people and wanted to make Wenatchee Valley his home. Gaige was constantly surrounded by family and friends, all too massive a number to count, and when you think you have the full list, more people crawl out of the woodwork, to announce how Gaige affected their lives for the better. He was loved as he loved, often, frequently, freely, and openly, and it changed those around him, as their love changed him. Young men, as they mature, find a new tribe to grow with and his new tribe was built out of care and motivation. Gaige was growing into a fine young man whose bright, warm light was snuffed out far too soon by an unfortunate miscalculation of risk. He was riding with his tribe, moving onto the home grounds as it were, and fell from their mount, landing on his head. So many strong and caring people tried to help him fight for his life, but his injuries were too severe, and his future changed in an instant. He went from being a youth full of life and full of future and promise, to helping others hold on to theirs, as the gifts of health and time were given from him to others who received his heart, kidneys, and liver. He is missed immensely, loved without measure, and though his mortal carriage is lifeless, his memory, his influence, and his name will ring immemorial, not just because his friends and family will sing it forever, but because his passing prevented this hurt for other families. May their lives be as rich in love, family, friends, promise, and potential as his was.
